A Historical Relic of a Foundry.

Some little interest has been felt in the discovery of an old iron tank nine feet in diameter by six deep and twelve or fifteen below the surface on the site of the livery stable just torn away on Pearl street, between Broadway and Ludlow streets, the McCammon property. It was rumored that this was a relic of old Fort Washington, which formerly occupied a site near these premises. The facts appear to be that the tank in question was a reservoir sunk as a cistern for the accommodation of a foundry that was carried on here some twenty-five years ago and had nothing to do with a prior date. Messrs. Jacobs & Meyers, who are doing the stone work for the four stores going up on the site of the old stable, report that when the row of houses on Ludlow street was being put up a few years since some of the logs of the old fort still securely bolted together, and in a very fair state of preservation, were dug out while the excavations were in progress, not anything startling has been found here.

Martin Meyer to Lena Thompson, quitclaim to same premises; $1 and other considerations.

Frederick E. Gunkel et al., per Sheriff, to Harrison P. Diehl, 53 by 99 feet, on the south side of Sixth street, 158 1/2 feet west of Elm street; $4,666 67.

R. G. HUSTON & CO.

Total Amount Paid Them, $1,710,264 74.

The Southern Railroad Trustees have settled with R. G. Huston & Co., the contractors who completed the Southern Road from Somerset to Boyce's Station. The settlement, however, is subject to the approval of the Sinking Fund Commissioners, who will not doubt give their approval.

The total amount paid Huston & Co. for their contract is as follows:

Final estimate	$1,410,868 85
Compromise on extra claim	123,000 00
Total	$1,533,868 85

It is understood that, while Huston & Co. have not made much money out of the contract, they are not losers, as they once feared they might be. Estimates by competent persons place their probable profit on the work at about $25,000.

The Sinking Fund Commissioners have been notified by the Trustees of their action, and will take action upon confirmation of the settlement at a very early date.
